ABANDONING THE RABBINATE

BY HERBERT J. SAMUEL

It is by no means a rare occurrence for a young man to throw up the idea of entering the rabbinate. Many a young man discovers in himself a change of mind and ambition during the long course of study necessary as a preparation for the Jewish ministry. The records of every theological seminary can show large numbers of such instances. Many of our most eminent lay leaders were originally trained for the pulpit, but were attracted to other professions. The community did not lose their services, but gets their services in another form. It is better so. It has also happened before now, and is likely to happen again, that a young man should look upon his decision not to enter the rabbinate as a most momentous event in Judaism. He is quite justified in this, as it is a most momentous event—in his Judaism. Some young men succeed in getting publicity; others do not.

THE ZIONIST EDUCATIONAL CONFERENCE

The Zionist Organization of America is calling a National Conference for Jewish Education. This is a good move, and we wish the meeting at New York on May 16 every success. We hope that it will turn out to be something more than just another of the "eindrucksvolle" occasions of which Zionists are so fond. Perhaps it is not quite fair to single out the Zionists, for in this respect they are no worse than the orthodox bar-mitzvahs and reform confirmations which concern themselves mainly with impressive ceremonies that make mothers' bosoms heave and fathers' tears flow, while the precocious little whippersnappers—both genders—think only of the vulgar display of the presents. American Jewish life has been fed far too much and far too long on the type of emotional food which turns to ashes in the mouth. It is really quite time to think of attempting to achieve something a little more solid and less showy in the line of Jewish education, and it is to be hoped that the latest National Conference will arrive at something sound. And it is also to be hoped that the Canadian Federation will take notice, for there is a great need for education work in Canada, too. The National Conference will, if it is wise and brave, find room for a discussion on what the education of the young Jew and Jewess is to be a preparation for: on what is the practical value of the present Jewish education. The Zionist Organization of America does not have to fear for Palestine funds. Campaign machinery is now most efficient. What it has to fear for is the soul of American Jewry. The Conference is a step in the right direction and we hope that it will find the way.

WHY MEN LEAVE THE MINISTRY

BY FERDINAND M. ISSERMAN

The resolve of James Waterman Wise to discontinue his rabbinical studies and not to enter the rabbinate deserved neither the prominence nor the publicity which it received. The number of students who commence preparations for the rabbinate or ministry and do not complete them is legion. Just as legion as is the number of men who set out to enter other professions and never attain their goals. The rigors of student life, the temptations of the business world, the weariness with a routine which becomes monotonous, the doubts concerning one's fitness for the selected profession, are factors which induce men to abandon their books, and to forego concluding their professional studies.

Wise had decided several months ago to leave the Jewish ministry. He did not renounce Judaism, but "he has chosen to withdraw from the professional preaching of certain religious doctrines which he considers of no importance." Of course, report and rumour distorted his attitude and his expressions. Many men whose fathers have not been as illustrious have left the ministry, and have given up pulpit-preaching without ado, disturbance or publicity. We all regret that the alarm bells have been sounded over the not unusual decision of a fine young fellow not to receive the ordination, so that an insignificant local occurrence has been magnified into a national sensation.

Yet one may well ask why men leave the ministry. One may well ask why does a fine young fellow with character and ideals eschew the rabbinate as a profession? Why is it that some of the noblest souls in Jewish life are not attracted to the Jewish ministry? Not because Judaism is inadequate or antiquated. Judaism is big enough, always has been big enough to contain many philosophies and even many God-ideas. Mystic and rationalist, fundamentalist and modernist can find a place in Judaism. The rabbinate fails to attract, we believe, not because of the inadequacy of Judaism, but because there are too many professing Jews and too few practicing Jews, because Judaism is glibly professed and as glibly forgotten.

At the theological seminaries, the embryo rabbis are urged to go out and be prophets, to preach a higher social order, to champion the cause of the oppressed. But yet when these students essay the prophetic role, and preach a higher morality to middle-class Jewish Babbitts, and these Babbitts protest to the seminaries, the seminary faculties are the first to censor their students. Rash indeed is the young rabbi who dares to suggest the application of prophetic ideals to the business world. Foolhardy indeed is the preacher who dares challenge the economic system, and ventures to bare its abuses. The outside world is under the impression that the ministry is gagged, and that preachers dare not speak on certain issues lest their large contributors withdraw, or lest their salaries are tampered with.

Classroom Judaism is beautiful, heroic and appealing, but too often it may not be voiced. There are few professions where so many men have a sense of defeat as in the rabbinate. After serving for

Grandpa's Hobby

By Johanna Mayer Frankel

He sat at his ease in his comfortable arm-chair, and puffed away at his long pipe. Was it not Friday afternoon—the day of days when a pipe tasted better than any other day of the week? To think of having to be separated from it for twenty-four hours, twenty-four long hours!

As Grandpa continued to smoke he turned to his visitor and said, "I always enjoy these few hours with my pipe before the Sabbath sets in. Although I gladly refrain from smoking on the Sabbath, as long as it is forbidden, yet, somehow, it's a bit of an effort to put it aside."

Sounds of sweeping and scouring came from all over the house—a sure sign of the approach of the day of rest. But nothing disturbed Grandpa; he alone remained calm. The house-cleaning was a woman's duty. All morning he had pottered around the garden, superintending this or that; giving a helping hand here and there. He paid particular attention to his rose bushes which no one else was allowed to touch. They were coming on fine; so were his young slips of oleanders, arranged in rows in a sunny spot. As far as he was concerned, his work for the week was done. Even the barber had been in to trim his beard and, incidentally, to unload the gossip of the week.

A long silence ensued, during which time each one of the old men followed his own trend of thought. Grandpa employed the interval by indulging in several long-drawn puffs. Then he stopped to inhale the fragrant aroma of his favorite brand of tobacco. These good old-timers knew nothing of restrictions. They smoked from the time they were recognized as having become full-fledged members of the synagogue. The pipe was a solace in times of stress. Grandpa even went so far as to recommend a pipe while trading with an obstinate customer. He said it gave him leisure to consider the other's offers and his meanings back of them. Often he claimed he had won out because of his pipe. And, as if there had been no interruption whatever, he continued in his conversational way, "You'll be astonished to hear that I've been using this tobacco," mentioning the renowned maker's name, "ever since the time of the great Revolution in 1848. Yes, sir," he went on, "from that time on, this one and no other." When two such old friends get together conversation flows uninterruptedly; there is no dearth of topics. But the afternoon began to wane and so they were surprised when Grandma came in to remind them that it would soon be time to get ready for the evening services.

Now Grandpa set to work with a will. He emptied the pipe of its ashes, scraped and cleaned the bowl, and while he filled it afresh, tapping the tobacco down with an expert thumb, he admired the Spanish beauty, her shapely head draped with a lace shawl, who adorned the side of the bowl. Grandma often teased him because at his age he still admired the pretty young girls who came to their house, especially if they had red cheeks—the redder their cheeks, the better he liked them. And the simple little country lasses never objected when he pinched their cheeks and occasionally stole a kiss. It kept them in practice during the week. All the young men were in the nearby cities and only came home on Friday just in time for evening prayers, and left again before day-break on Monday. Poor little, red-cheeked country lasses!

He surely was in a reminiscent mood this particular Friday afternoon. "See this scraper," displaying the narrow silver blade with which he had cleaned his pipe-bowl. "One of my sons brought it over from America, and this cigar-cutter," a pretty ornament of gold attached to his watch-chain, "another son brought it from over there." While testing his pipe with a lighted match to see if it were in fit condition for the morrow, he told his visitor that his gold watch and chain had also come from overseas. That was during those first years when his boys had gone to seek their fortunes in the new world.

"And this photo," proudly, as he opened the old-fashioned timepiece, "is our oldest son's wife and their first-born—our very first grandchild."

"How the years roll by!" giving the finishing touch to his weekly preparations. "I can hardly believe that I was four score and five last September."

From the adjoining bed-room, where she has freshened up and donned her best scheidel and a black silk apron, came the good wife's voice: "Your Sabbath clothes are laid out on your bed; you'll be late if you do not begin to get ready soon."

There was finality in grandma's voice; the friends bade each other a hasty adieu after that. Grandpa placed his pipe in the rack where many others of all sizes and shapes reposed. Anniversaries and birthdays had greatly augmented their numbers.

Then he unlocked his old writing desk, a splendid specimen of fine walnut which many a connoisseur had admired enviously, and emptied his pockets of their contents. There was, first of all, his purse—for he wouldn't be touching money until the Sabbath was over—next a bunch of keys, several pieces of which he always carried, quite a collection, a little note book and other odds and ends—all of which he deposited in a drawer, there to remain until he got back into his work-a-day clothes. From a tiny secret recess, of whose existence only he and the [illegible] were aware, he brought forth a beautiful chased gold snuff-box. His name and date were engraved thereon. This was a Sabbath substitute for his pipe.

"The Parness has just passed by," Grandma announced as she entered the room, carrying a pair of [illegible] light later on, the Sabbath candles.

It is said that when the Temple Brotherhood of a St. Louis congregation invited Clarence Darrow to speak some people objected on the ground that he is an atheist. In every community there are those obstructors, those clutterers who never want to hear anything except what they have already adopted as their own thoughts and never enjoy a printed page so much as when it echoes something they themselves have said or thought. They are just the ones to fear that Clarence Darrow might do them some vague harm, such as sneaking up on them while obstensibly speaking on the prohibition law, and enticing them away from their faith. True to type, they are always trying to rob themselves of something precious, some inspiration that they need.

No matter what Clarence Darrow believes about God he should be welcomed particularly by Jews wherever he is good enough to come to speak. Most Jews must be drawn toward Darrow because of what he stands for. While many other forceful men busy themselves in the passage of laws which cause hardship and suffering among the homeless and oppressed, and ill-feeling between races, Darrow thinks of America as a haven for the persecuted. Although his family came to this country in the early part of the seventeenth century other men of personal power push ahead of him to urge the closing of gates, the placing of bars against the immigrant. Others may seek to unite church and state by working to introduce religious teaching in the public schools but Darrow believes that people should worship as they please, do what they want to and live as they like so long as they don't interfere with the same right of others.

Darrow is the enemy of intolerance and ignorance, of national smugness and self-satisfaction. In a time when men run in packs and those with voices to raise, raise them for the wrong things, Darrow is sharply defined as a rebuke to the standardization that crushes individualism. What difference should it make whether he is an atheist or a Seventh Day Adventist or a Dunkard? He is a friend to man, a great liberal, and therefore should be welcomed with no stupid questions asked.

"We are constant readers of your weekly paper (REVIEW) and feel sorry that we have to comment severely on one article in particular, as printed in some of your recent issues. This matter is very much disapproved by a great number of your readers. We know this for a fact, as we have overheard the same topic being discussed very severely in many homes. They have mentioned it in this manner—'The idea of such a paper printing such unnecessary stuff as Social News of Twenty-five Years Ago.' Why—don't you know that same has caused many arguments among the older folks, also caused sadness, grievance, etc?

"We would desire that you eliminate this 'Twenty-five Years Ago' stuff and substitute the song entitled 'Twenty-five Years from Now,' which would prove more interesting.

"If we find that you still continue this undesired topic, then we will deliberately sever with you people entirely as to ads, etc.

"Trusting you will take this matter into serious consideration."

The above letter is given to the world in, alas, an unaccustomed burst of generosity. It shows what could be done in the way of an anonymous letter department if editors put their minds to it and were more indulgent than they are. As a rule anonymous communications receive far too little notice. They are glanced at, sometimes read by mistake, and thrown on the floor, so often called the waste basket. Such a pity. They should always be read even though there are only twenty-four hours to a day and part of that must still be frittered away in sleep. The letters would be good for editors. These people are seldom anything but washed-out, crabby, hostile, unlovely persons whose infrequent laughs are like the scraping together of twigs from which the sap of youth has gone forever. They should relax a little in the privacy of their mail-bag correspondence and occasionally share what they find there. The above is for everybody just as a beginning and if it works out all right there will be more, dears. It is signed very modestly "A Couple of Readers" and their identity is unknown. Perhaps, sad to say, they are what Oliver Wendell Holmes would have called "ungathered roses on their ancestral tree." Perhaps, too, they were already bridesmaids twenty-five years ago when they should have been only train-bearers.

twenty-five years, a rabbi may have nothing tangible to show for his efforts. He may have made an impression on his people, but it is an impression which is generally invisible and which cannot be measured. Despite the fact that frequently the rabbi's work is discouraging, despite the fact that no serious attempt is made by the laiety to live Judaism, despite the fact that a materialistic world will often crush a heroic idealistic soul, we would urge men to enter the rabbinate. Because Judaism is not practiced, because money is king, because ideals are treated as strangers because Jewish life is pale and anaemic the challenge comes to strong and brave souls to teach and to preach the prophetic platform. Yes, the way is hard. Yes, the obstacles are many. Yes the disillusionments are frequent—but the opportunities for service are innumerable, and the reward—not victory—but the joy of having fought the battle of the Lord of Hosts.

Lucius N. Littauer, who recently endowed a chair in Jewish philosophy and literature at Harvard University has promised a yearly contribution of $10,000 to New York University, to be used for research in the cure of pneumonia.

We could easily tangle anyone with a mass of technical talk as to why soft water is a vitally important part of the "family wash" process. In plain English—we couldn't produce the best laundry work in Toronto without it, so we use it—make it, in fact—right on the premises—so we know it is soft. This is just one feature of many used in our five different kinds of laundry service. They are all good and all reasonable as to charges. Can you afford longer to be without this service? The Hebrew Kindergarten at the Talmud Torah

By F. FRANK, Assistant Principal.

The average Jew on this continent is unfortunately very skeptical about the possibilities of a good Jewish education for his children. This perhaps, more than anything else, accounts for his apathetic attitude towards any effort of undertaking an ambitious task in the Jewish educational field. It is surprising how the average Jewish parent will keep on paying for the Hebrew tuition of his children for a number of years, rob them of their hours of play and outdoors, expecting nothing more in return than a fluency in the purely mechanical reading of the prayers, a parrot-like chanting of the Haftorah and, pardon our frankness, an idiotic "speech" at the bar-mitzvah celebration.

It will be a highly refreshing and perhaps a curative experience for such a Jew to visit the Toronto Hebrew Free School and, in particular, the Hebrew Kindergarten in that school. Such a visit will also be found extremely encouraging by those few intelligent and serious-minded Jews who entertain the idea that with a proper and systematically directed effort and with persistent action one can in time bring about better conditions in Jewish education. A visitor to the Hebrew Kindergarten will find himself in the pleasant atmosphere of a well-furnished and well-equipped room, neatly arranged and tastefully decorated. He will find a group of children of from four to six years of age who, under the guidance of a qualified teacher, not only learn the Hebrew language in a way which makes the learning a pleasure to them, but also develop their natural capacities according to modern pedagogical methods.

The Kindergarten is conducted along the lines of the Montessorian system somewhat modified by the principles of the older Froebelian system. The idea is that the children should learn while working and playing and that the work should be so directed as to be synonymous with play. You may find these children at the table cutting, moulding, designing, or you may find them marching or performing calisthenic exercises, or singing, or playing games, or seated in a circle around their teacher, listening to a story.

Throughout the whole session, the only language used is Hebrew. Of course, it is more difficult to develop the children in a language they do not understand than it would be in English, and it requires a great deal of patience and affection on the part of the teacher to make the children enjoy their hours in the Kindergarten and benefit by them. In this case the task is carried out successfully. When you have seen the fine progress the children made at the Kindergarten during the odd few months of its existence, you will realize the possibilities in store for them in the way of acquiring Jewish culture, if only they continue for a number of years along the same lines of proper method.

It is unfortunate that the Jews do not as yet fully realize the advantages accruing out of a Hebrew Kindergarten, and the number of children attending the Kindergarten is comparatively small. This is due to the fact that modern Jewish education, which is already thriving in many American cities, is but a very recent innovation in Toronto.

It is high time to discard the ridiculous notion that everything pertaining to Judaism is connected with inefficiency and "batlonus." When modern methods are widely adopted and put in the service of intensive Jewish education, we shall be a long way further than we are towards solving the grave problem of "Survival of Judaism in America."

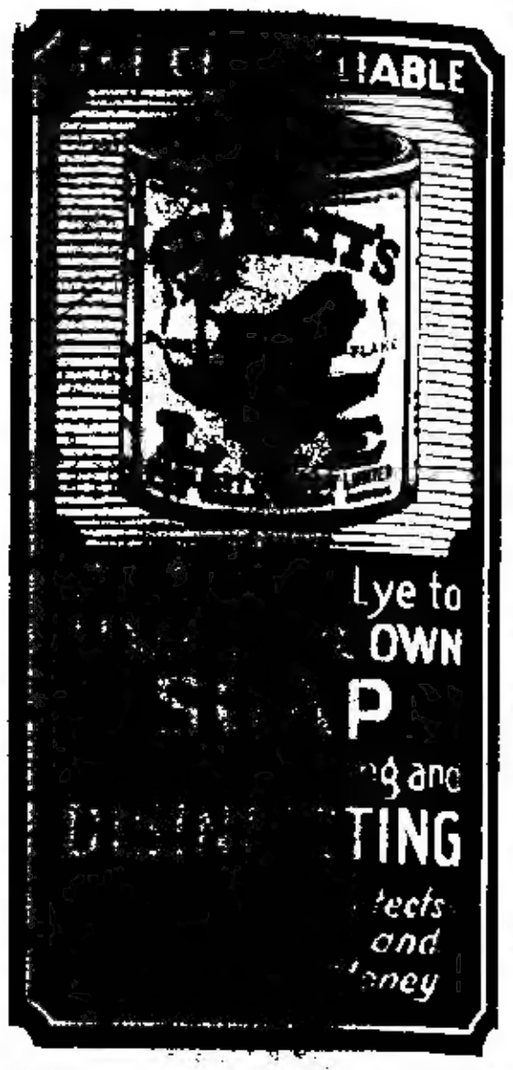
$100,000 CAMPAIGN OBJECTIVE FOR ONTARIO

Appealing for some measure of relief in what he described as a Jewish inferno to which event Dante could not have done justice, Dr. Henry Muskovitz, president of the United Jewish campaign organized for reconstruction work in Europe, addressed delegates from the Jewish communities throughout the province at the Primrose Club May 2. After graphically picturing the conditions of starvation, disease and miserable poverty existing in Poland, Russia and Bessarabia where the work is to be carried on, Dr. Muskovitz concluded his address with a note of optimism as he spoke of the opportunities which might be opened up for these people. In Russian particularly, he declared, the Jews had a great potential future.

The specific purpose of the visit of Dr. Muskovitz to Toronto was to ascertain the quota which the Jews of Ontario are willing to accept as their contributions to the drive. On the motion of Mr. Perkins, which followed the address, it was decided that $100,000 as the minimum amount to be raised in three years should be accepted by the Province. Charles Draimin, of Toronto, was elected chairman of the Provincial committee and Leo Frankel honorary chairman. There was a feeling on the part of some delegates that a larger amount than $100,000 should be raised in Ontario and that it was not advisable to determine a minimum quota for the moment. Rabbi Ferdinand Isserman, chairman, pointed out, however, that the central executive at New York were awaiting their answer.

When Poland, inhabited by 3,000,000 Jews, had become free, political philosophies have been superimposed which had resulted in ruin for the Jewish capitalist and a struggle for the right to work on the part of the artisan. The professional classes were even worse. In one city he had seen doctors, lawyers, journalists, men who represented the soul of the people, sneaking into the soup kitchens to get a meal. Children were being turned loose on the streets with tickets on them by parents who could optain no food to keep them alive. The number of foundlings had doubled in the last year, while the child mortality had increased 27 per cent. Among the children from the ages of 6 to 16, fifteen per cent. were tubercular, twenty per cent. suffering from trachoma, while sixty-four per cent. were undernourished to a degree of starvation. During the year there had been 15,000 cases of favus, and no less than 75,000 deaths from tuberculosis. To treat these cases there was one Jewish hospital in Warsaw with 175 beds.

In Bessarabia, while the political conditions were better than those of Poland, economic conditions were such that more than 15,000 Jews were not only underfed, but actually dying of starvation. There were areas in which the child mortality was 100 per cent., due to lack of nourishment, while tens of thousands of people were in acute want. For two successive years there had been a failure of crops, and many were being kept alive only by the rations which the joint distribution committee were able to provide consisting of two pounds of cornmeal and one pound of potatoes. It was not a case of hunger, but of actual famine.



YOUNG JUDAEA DEBATES

The regular weekly Young Judaean debates took place Wednesday evening, April 28, at Ryerson Public School. The Hatikvah Girls, led by Miss Eva Benjamin, and the Judith Girls, led by Miss Gladys Papernick, two senior circles of Young Judaea, debated on the resolution "That co-operative rather than private enterprise should be encouraged in Palestine." The Hatikvah Girls won on the affirmative. The Philo Boys, led by Dr. J. A. Sherman, won on the affirmative of the resolution "That anti-Semitism is a real danger to the Jews," against the Jordan Boys, led by Dr. Mark Zimmerman. The Queen Esther Circle, led by Jeanne Solomon, won on the negative side of the resolution "That Herzl was a greater leader than Moses," against the Palestine Twigs, led by Thelma Goldberg. Maurice Starkman was chairman.

The final mock parliament takes place at Zionist Building, Saturday, May 29, at 7 p.m. The resolution before the house will be "That in the opinion of this House the future development of Palestine should be encouraged along manufacturing and commercial rather than agricultural lines." Maurice Starkman will act as speaker and R. H. Sufrin as clerk.

Queen Esther Circle pledged $5 to Keren Hayesod.

Bernard M. Baruch has purchased $10,000 worth of the Stone Mountain Memorial half dollars. Announcement to this effect was recently made by Hollins N. Randolph, president of the Stone Mountain Memorial Association.

LOEW'S PICTURE

Thomas Meighan, interpreter of fine and gallant roles, is the hero of the big feature film which will be seen next week at Loew's, for the beloved Tom is to star in a thrilling Florida tale, specially written for him by that inimitable wit, Ring Lardner.

"The New Klondike," as the illustrious Ring has called his romance, is the fascinating story of a baseball player who journeys to the skyrocketing south for ball practice and remains to beat the real estate sharks at their own game. The wit of Lardner has been translated admirably to the screen by the director, and Alvin Wyckoff, one of the finest camera men in the business, has captured some unforgettable scenes of the greatest beauty spots in Florida, waving palms, dark waters and heavenly sunsets. They are all exquisitely reproduced as a background for this smart and entertaining story. Lila Lee is a most adorable little heroine. The supporting cast is worthy of the two very popular stars.

during the summer days, and what comparatively little inconvenience it causes. We welcome it now as an addition to the pleasure of life. But its adoption only came after a long, patient and persistent struggle waged by a small group of enthusiasts who year after year introduced the Daylight Saving Bill into the British House of Commons, only to have it killed by ridicule. It was treated as a joke, as the impractical fad of a few cranks. The "hardy annual," as it was called, was made the butt of endless fun until public opinion began to see something sensible in the idea. Then real opposition arose, the inevitable opposition of conservative prejudice. Then it was argued that it would create all manner of confusion. It was against the order of nature. Cows and chickens would ignore the setting on of the clock, therefore man must not attempt it. It is very doubtful whether we would have had it yet had it not been for the suggestion of economy that made an appeal during the frantic years of the war.

There is always a loudly voiced objection to change, on the part of those who lack vision, whose gaze is rooted on the past alone. When Sir James Simpson, in 1847, introduced the use of chloroform for women in childbirth, his practice was objected to by the clergy. It was, they claimed, a contravention of the divine plan that as a punishment for Eve's sin woman was to bring forth children in pain. The scruples of the clergy were only set at rest when Sir James Simpson argued that anaesthetics was approved in the Bible when God put Adam into a deep sleep before He removed the rib. Even so, opposition to the use of chloroform in maternity cases persisted for a long time on religious grounds. The resort to cremation was also declared to be discordant with the teaching of the resurrection of the body. Lord Shaftesbury attempted to justify cremation by asking the question "what became of the blessed martyrs who were burnt at the stake?" The ashes of martyrs burnt at the stake were often scattered to the winds with the deliberate intent to destroy all hope of resurrection. Christian military commanders had Indian mutineers and African rebels blown to pieces from the mouth of guns with the same idea in mind. In the early days of the Standard Oil Trust a petition was presented to the United States Congress praying that a stop might be put to the irreverent and irreligious drawing of petroleum from the earth which was interfering with the designs of the Almighty who had stored it there as fuel for hell and for the destruction of the earth by burning. Senator Jefferson Davis is reported to have expressed the pious wish that Mr. Rockefeller might be burnt in hell with his own oil.

It is amusing to look back on such objections to progress, but at the time they were very real and seriously meant. History is full of the powerful influences wielded by the fears of prejudiced conservatism in the retarding of the advancement of civilization. And the same tendency is active to-day. Every change involves a struggle against the forces of reaction, backed by the inertia of indifference.

A strange thing about Daylight Saving is that it should be necessary to delude ourselves by putting on the clock. Why not simply start everything an hour earlier during the summer months? We are such slaves of habit that we simply could not do it. We have to be deluded into it. In ancient days daylight saving was an actual thing. The working day started at dawn and ended at dark. Whether the day was long or short, as much of it as possible was used. As the days grew longer work started earlier. In the Talmud and in the Shulchan Aruch the basis of the twelve hour day from dawn to night is used in calculating the statutory times for the recital of the fixed prayers. The Temple ceremonial was regulated in the same way, for in Palestine the daily life started with the rising of the sun and ended with its setting.

It is interesting to think that in some ways we seek improvement by actually going backwards. The reform involved in daylight saving is only a return to the habits of older days. Many wholesome customs of former times have dropped into the discard. At the same time we have to be on our guard against imagining that everything old is beautiful on account of its age. The interesting descriptions of the ancient daylight saving in Palestine are buried in a mass of ponderous ritual that has been most conveniently forgotten. The earlier days of simple life in England when the day started at dawn would be most unwelcome to us now. At the same time we are grateful for the revival that gives us a longer summer day. Progress sometimes looks backward with advantage.

"And there goes Schloma Loeb," of whom she caught a fleeting glimpse as she happened to look out of a window facing the main street, "It's high time when he goes," she said to herself, as by that time grandpa was heard splashing the water and making hurried progress with his dressing. And in a very short while he was on his way down the cobbled street, carrying a delicately embroidered bag containing his talis.

The next morning Sabbath services are going forward as usual, when grandpa beckons to a little lad across the aisle and whispers, "Here, take this over to Afrom Baer; I see he's waiting for it." Placing his treasured snuff-box in the child's hand he says; "Wait until he's taken a pinch or two and then bring it back to me." As the lad walks off, he adds, still in a hushed voice, "Be very careful not to drop it." The men are seated according to their ages, the oldest in the front rows and so on to the youngest at the rear of the building. His eyes follow the little fellow up the aisle, past the huge stove. "That was another fine idea of my children," he thinks, "to give the congregation some means of heating the synagogue."

Still watching the child as he turns down the far aisle and at last lands at his journey's end, he continues musingly, "My boys remembered those cold mornings of their youth no doubt, when one could see one's breath ejected in columns of steam." Afrom is having a regular orgy of taking snuff. While he indulges, a liberal pinch on this side, the one on the other, he gazes across at grandpa acknowledging his appreciation with a friendly nod.

They have not disturbed the services at all—it is not an unusual occurrence; and after a while the snuff-box is returned to the proud possessor. He taps it gently, gracefully, just as they did in the days of lace ruffles at the wrist—throws back the lid, takes a copious pinch, and as he does so, emits a long-drawn "Ah!" of purest pleasure. Then off he sends the beautiful golden receptacle, off on its weekly pilgrimage to the others—the impatiently waiting devotees of snuff. Ensues a veritable tornado of sneezing, a volley from this direction, from the front, from the back of the auditorium—from all over.

"Yes," nods grandpa to a grateful and appreciative neighbour, "it's a new kind of snuff, supposed to be the finest on the market," adding as an afterthought, "One of my sons got it in England on his way over here."

Up in the ladies' gallery sounds of a concerted rising on feet is slightly heard; faces appear behind the lattice enclosure. Smiles of recognition with husbands, fathers, brothers and sons are exchanged. The ladies faces are living question marks. One very plump little matron standing on tip-toe, soon discovers the cause of the disturbance and announces to those nearest to her: "What else can it be but grandpa's gold snuff-box going the rounds?"

Grandma nods delightedly and to an admiring and friendly group remarks "How much pleasure he has been able to give his friends since our children brought it to him on our fiftieth wedding anniversary."

Of a Sabbath, right after dinner it was the custom from 'way back to indulge in afternoon naps. The grandparents always took advantage of those quiet hours and only when coffee was announced at four o'clock did they turn up. Then in fine weather as on this very Sabbath, they took a leisurely stroll along the winding stream, across the little bridge to the cool, inviting woods beyond.

As the sun began to sink toward the horizon, the pleasant living-room began to fill with Grandpa's old cronies and their wives. Courteously Grandpa rises as he offers his comfortable arm-chair—the seat of honour as it were—to Afrom his oldest and best friend.

And while stories of long ago are told the snuff-box again plays the leading role. But they were men well versed in the affairs of state and country. And the world at large was discussed intelligently, the wonderful strides that science had made in their times. There was the auto—no longer in its infancy; electricity was displacing the oil lamp, and, wonder of wonders, a huge Zeppelin had hovered over their village only a few days ago. They repeated again and again, how they had stood in awe at this apparition, so that their eyes had overflowed. "The Lord is great," someone softly remarked, "to let man invade the upper regions."

Known as being the best teller of anecdotes among them, Grandpa keeps on until it grows dark in the cozy living-room and individual objects can no longer be seen. That reminds them that it is time to go to evening prayers. The men only, of course; while the ladies wend their steps homeward, keeping an eye on the sky overhead. And as soon as the first star makes its appearance the lamps are lighted, but not before.

When, later on, Grandpa returns, there is the little tray, with a wax taper the tiny glass overflowing with wine the pretty little perforated container filled with spices, all ready and only waiting for him to bless the Sabbath and the advent of the coming week.

Everyone sips of the wine as Grandpa says a short prayer and himself inhaling the spicy odour, passes it on to his better half and so on it goes the rounds. Then upon the heads of the members of the household he lays his hands in benediction, to which each responds with, "a good week."

Supper follows, a simple repast then—and then—grandpa hies him to his pipe-rack, brings forth the pipe he had so painstakingly prepared twenty-four hours ago, twenty-four long hours. He strikes a match, touches it to the tobacco—takes one good long puff, leans back in his arm-chair and is oblivious to all that goes on about him. He is blissfully, ecstatically happy.
